Jules Simon, the French statesman and orator, is now in his seventy-fifth year, though he looks younger. Says a correspondent: "As an orator M. Jules Simon has few rivals. Ordinarily calm and persuasive, he can, when the occasion requires, be as impetuous as his former rival, Gambetta. Coquelin never misses a sitting of the chamber when he knows that Jules Simon is to speak. When he is in the tribune he places both hands on the desk in front of him, leans slightly forward and begins in a low voice. As he proceeds with his subject his voice becomes clearer and, although it is never powerful, is so skilfully handled that its sounds reach the furthest corners of the room."
